What content do you want to remove?

- Content that is not yours
- Content that is not in the public domain
- Content that is not in the public domain
- Content that is not in the public domain

The search results are controlled by those sites and not by Google. Google only reflects the content on the web. Removing a page from search results does not remove it from the web, and people will still be able to see the content by going to it directly or via other search engines.

What else do you want to do? If a site is violating copyright or other laws, you can:

- Contact the website owner and ask them to get the problematic content updated or removed.
- Work with the appropriate legal authorities to get a content removed from the web.

Once the changes have been made, Google will update our index and how they are displayed. There may be a short period when our search results still include the content. In this case, we recommend reporting the content to the relevant authorities.

Thank you for your feedback. We will use it to improve our services.
