£26m drive for Gaelic

THE SNP have unveiled plans to spend £26million translating road signs into Gaelic.

The Scottish government will also adopt a bilingual logo with staff forced to take Gaelic training.

And secondary school pupils will be persuaded to take up classes instead of a foreign language.

The plan has been devised over five years following a request from quango Bord na Gaidhlig.

But Tory Ted Brocklebank said: "It's not for the government to go on a crusade to take Gaelic into every area of Scotland. Let's save it in the Highlands."
